There is a clear imbalance between the importance of trust for the functioning of a health care system and the priority given to research on trust. Historically, health care, especially primary care, has enjoyed a high level of trust compared to other sectors in society. 1 However, scholars are now pointing towards something of a trust crisis in health care systems. 2 For example, in the USA the crisis is attributed, at least in part, to a decline in trust in the government, repeated ...

But when it comes to care itself, one belief seems universal no matter where you fall in the great policy debate: you want a doctor you can trust. "If your patient feels they're just another number, you won't establish the trust you need to create a connection," said Dr. James Doty, clinical professor of Neurosurgery at Stanford University. But do strong doctor/patient connections impact health outcomes?

Abstract. In the UK health service trust has traditionally played an important part in the relationships between its three key actors: the state, health care practitioners, and patients and the public. However, in recent years the micro relationship between patient and health care practitioner and the macro environment in which these relationships operate have been subject to considerable change as the NHS has been modernised.
